Appendix index and certification

This public appendix identifies each included item, preserves PA pagination, and pairs protected material with an equal-page redacted counterpart.

The index lets a public reader locate the legal record without guessing what a sealed page contains. It identifies dates, document titles, and the purpose of each included item, while the certificate explains the page correspondence between public and sealed counterparts. The appendix is the selected essential record needed to assess the petition and emergency motion.

March 25 production order overview

The public order states the categorical-waiver holding and commands production by April 1 without reproducing protected memorandum content.

The overview reproduces the operative result rather than counsel's protected material. It tells the public that the court used a categorical subject-matter theory and set April 1 as the deadline. Those facts establish the order under review and the seven-day clock without exposing the memorandum passages or detailed log descriptions that Cinder Lake says remain privileged.

April 1 district stay order

The order denying a district stay confirms that production remained due while Cinder Lake sought appellate relief.

The stay denial is essential because it leaves no district protection after the April 1 filing. Its public text shows that the court relied on ordinary review and existing protective arrangements, permitting the panel to evaluate adequacy. It contains no sealed communication and therefore appears in the public appendix in the same form available on the district docket.

August 21 response letter

The complete public letter says outside counsel reviewed billing concerns and Cinder Lake adopted remedial measures, but reveals no communication or legal advice.

The letter is the alleged waiver trigger and is fully public, not a redacted privileged document. Its precise wording permits direct comparison: review by outside counsel and adoption of remedial measures are disclosed, but advice and witness communications are not. Including the whole letter prevents Cinder Lake from relying on a selective paraphrase in the petition.

January 9 Rule 502(d) order

The protective order governs inadvertent and authorized litigation disclosures prospectively and leaves the pre-suit letter question unresolved.

The January order establishes the prospective handling rules for later discovery. Its public provisions cover clawback, authorized disclosure, and nonwaiver treatment without deciding the August letter. Placement after the letter highlights the chronology: the lawsuit order could govern February exchanges, but it did not exist when Cinder Lake communicated with the oversight office.

March 24 hearing excerpt

The public transcript records the competing legal positions and the court's focus on shared subject matter, with privileged colloquy redacted.

The public hearing extract shows each party's legal theory and the court's emphasis on shared subject matter. Where the colloquy would reveal protected structure or content, a labeled redaction preserves the page position. The visible remainder is sufficient to show that Cinder Lake requested item-specific treatment and Calder argued that fairness required broader access.

Essential challenged provision

The reproduced March 25 text deems all investigation materials within a broad subject category waived and orders complete production within seven calendar days.

This page contains the exact order language the writ targets. The categorical paragraph treats the investigation subject as waived, and the next command requires the complete files by April 1. Because relief is tied to those provisions, reproducing them avoids ambiguity about whether Cinder Lake challenges a mere discovery schedule or a substantive waiver determination.

March 26 reconsideration motion

The filing asks the district court to distinguish communications from underlying facts and to pause production pending review.

The reconsideration motion preserves the communications-facts argument and proposes alternatives such as improved logging and controlled review. Its public version does not quote the sealed memorandum. The filing date also demonstrates that Cinder Lake returned promptly to the district court rather than waiting until production was imminent to identify the claimed legal error.

March 30 reconsideration denial

The public order adheres to categorical waiver and declines to extend the production deadline.

The denial confirms that the district court understood and rejected the distinction Cinder Lake now presents. It adheres to the original subject-matter rationale and leaves the deadline untouched. A public reader can therefore assess the procedural posture without receiving protected communications, and the appellate court can see why another district request was unlikely to preserve confidentiality.

Response-letter context

The appendix places the August 21 letter beside the nonprivileged chronology, showing that it announced review and remediation without describing counsel's communications.

The public chronology places Calder's reports, counsel's retention, the response letter, remediation, litigation, and discovery exchanges in temporal order. It supplies context independently of the protected interviews. The central comparison remains visible: the public letter announces high-level outcomes, while the redacted portions of the memorandum are identified as communications and analysis rather than repeated public facts.

March 30 emergency district-stay motion

Cinder Lake explains that disclosure would defeat meaningful review and proposes protection limited to disputed documents.

The emergency district motion identifies the concrete disclosure date and the categories at risk. It asks only to preserve those materials while appellate review is sought, leaving factual discovery open. That proposed limitation informs the contemporaneous appellate request for emergency protection and shows that Cinder Lake did not first demand a blanket halt to every request involving billing practices.

April 1 district-stay denial

The court concludes that ordinary review is adequate and leaves the production deadline unchanged.

The denial entered on the production date removes the last district-court barrier to disclosure. Its reasoning and timestamp are public and require no special access. Together with the March 25 order, it establishes why emergency appellate protection was requested before ordinary merits consideration could begin. That timestamp supplies the final public preservation fact available when the petition package was presented that day.

Public memorandum surrogate

Categories and dates are visible, but privileged communications, interview substance, and attorney analysis are replaced with specific redaction labels.

The surrogate identifies the memorandum's date, authoring role, recipients, broad sections, and asserted grounds. Protected prose is replaced with descriptive redaction blocks long enough to preserve the twelve-page alignment. A public reader learns what categories are claimed and can follow the litigation history, but cannot reconstruct interview answers, counsel's emphasis, or legal recommendations.

Public privilege-log surrogate

The public log identifies date ranges and broad document families while withholding item-level descriptions that would reveal protected substance.

The log surrogate lists nonrevealing fields and broad families while withholding descriptions that would disclose the substance of requests for advice or counsel's work. Its eight-page alignment supports consistent citations. The public version is not evidence that every entry is privileged; it gives enough structure for the dispute while reserving item-level adjudication for confidential judicial review.
