Sealed appendix index and certification

Each page maps to the corresponding page of the public appendix. Access is limited by the motion and certificate, and this appendix creates no district electronic-access right.

The sealed index matches the public appendix item for item and page for page, allowing the same citations in both versions. It records that access depends on the sealing motion and confidentiality certificate, not on the existence of this file alone. The complete appendix remains a judicial review aid and adds nothing outside the district record submitted with the petition.

March 25 production order overview

The complete order is reproduced, including its reliance on the asserted relationship between the letter's subject and the investigation.

The complete order allows the panel to examine the district court's wording and the relation between its reasoning and the protected exhibits. Although this page is sealed as part of the appendix pair, the order's operative result is also publicly summarized. Sealing the compilation does not convert otherwise public judicial text into privileged content.

April 1 district stay order

The full denial confirms that no district protection remained when the petition was filed.

The full stay denial supplies the same posture as the public appendix and any protected contextual references included in the sealed compilation. The court can verify that production remained due and that the district judge considered preservation. No appellate ruling is presumed from the inclusion of this order. The protected compilation confirms the denial's scope while preserving the same April 1 timing shown in the public counterpart.

August 21 response letter

The same public letter is reproduced without alteration so the panel can compare its general language to the protected materials.

The exact public response letter is repeated unchanged inside the sealed volume so authorized readers can compare like with like. Its presence under this cover does not make it secret. The significant point is what the letter lacks when placed beside the memorandum: no interview quotation, no confidential request for advice, and no legal recommendation.

January 9 Rule 502(d) order

The complete prospective clawback and nonwaiver terms are included for the timing dispute.

The complete Rule 502(d) order fixes the later-disclosure protocol, including clawback and authorized use. It confirms that the court treated subsequent litigation handling separately from pre-suit conduct. Authorized access to this appendix does not broaden the order's temporal effect or make the August 2025 letter retroactively protected. The order's complete terms also confirm that no party claimed a retroactive effect for the August response.

March 24 hearing excerpt

The authorized transcript includes the protected colloquy concerning counsel's memorandum structure and the parties' competing privilege characterizations.

The unredacted colloquy records how counsel described the memorandum's organization and why Calder sought the full investigation file. It lets the panel test whether the district court's reasoning rested on protected descriptions. That review occurs under seal; the public appendix preserves the argument sequence without exposing those details. Confidential judicial review can therefore assess the reasoning without turning the protected colloquy into a public disclosure.

Essential challenged provision

The exact categorical-waiver and seven-day-production paragraphs are reproduced as the operative order provisions requiring appellate attention.

The challenged paragraphs show that the court moved from a public reference to counsel's review directly to subject-wide waiver and complete production. The seven-day command covers both communications and work product without entry-specific findings. This page identifies the order provisions that the petition asks the Court to vacate and preserves their full language for present judicial review.

March 26 reconsideration motion

The complete filing identifies protected categories and offers document-specific review as an alternative.

The complete reconsideration filing identifies specific memorandum sections and log families so the district court could revisit its ruling. It also offers item-specific review and continued fact discovery. Those details support preservation and remedy arguments but remain sealed because their descriptions could reveal the protected substance under dispute. Those protected descriptions explain the proposed alternative without asking the appellate court to decide each category itself.

March 30 reconsideration denial

The unredacted denial preserves the court's full reasoning and production timetable.

The unredacted denial shows the court declined the proposed alternatives and maintained its categorical view. Its inclusion establishes that Cinder Lake presented the precise issue below. The panel may consider that history when assessing appropriateness, while recognizing that mandamus does not require a mechanical exhaustion checklist. The denial's complete reasoning shows that the document-specific alternative was presented and rejected before the writ petition.

Response-letter context

The full chronology demonstrates that the letter's general reference to review and remediation did not convey the interviews, legal assessment, or advice recorded separately.

The full chronology links the public response to the underlying sequence without equating the two. It identifies when interviews occurred, when counsel formed legal assessments, when management chose operational changes, and when the public letter was drafted. The comparison shows which events can be proved independently and which passages reflect confidential legal work.

March 30 emergency district-stay motion

The complete declaration describes the protected contents and the consequences of adversary disclosure.

The sealed stay motion distinguishes Ashe's existing protected review copies from the twenty underlying logged communications, drafts, work product, and attachments not yet delivered. First compelled production of those source items supplies the irreparable-harm theory. The public appendix states the categories and deadline, so withholding protected particulars does not obscure either the requested stay or its scope.

April 1 district-stay denial

The full order rejects a pause and keeps the compelled production date at April 1.

The complete denial confirms the court rejected a pause despite the identified protected content. Its April 1 timestamp is the final district action before appellate filing. The order does not adjudicate the ultimate privilege of every entry; it simply leaves the broad production command enforceable, creating the emergency posture. Its April 1 effect supplies the last district ruling and does not itself resolve the pending mandamus petition.

Sealed investigation memorandum

The appendix supplies counsel's protected interview summaries, source selection, legal-risk assessment, and recommendations for confidential judicial comparison only.

The memorandum includes confidential communications collected for legal advice, counsel's selection and ordering of facts, assessment of regulatory and litigation risk, and recommendations to management. Ordinary claim records remain separately obtainable.

Confidential judicial review allows a court to distinguish those elements rather than accepting either party's categorical characterization. Its inclusion permits controlled comparison with the public counterpart while keeping independent factual sources outside the privilege claim.

Sealed privilege log

The appendix supplies item-level dates, participants, purposes, and privilege or work-product grounds for authorized document-specific review.

The complete log provides dates, participants, communication purposes, document types, and asserted privilege or work-product bases. Some entries may ultimately require production or narrower treatment. The sealed page supplies the information needed for that review, while the public appendix preserves only nonrevealing categories so privilege is not decided by accidental disclosure. The item-level fields permit individualized adjudication without exposing protected content through the public counterpart.
